A bit of history: Originally it was a small farming village. In the tenth century it became a part of Sarria, and in 1714 it was declared an autonomous municipality. Finally, in 1897 it was annexed to Barcelona. That was when the area of Sant Gervasi was discovered by the Catalan bourgeoisie, who began their first developments there. In just over 50 years, it became a bustling residential area with manor houses, holiday villas and monasteries. The unique feel of the area is distinguished by the architectural style that retains the atmosphere of the past.

Notable sites include the Rotonda building, the gardens designed by Rubio, the Science Museum and the old Casacubiarta factory designed by the famous Catalan architect Josep Domènch i Estapà.
